ADMINISTRATION FAILURE

When the Guardians of Sephira first began to manifest, Na Yubin refused to join the retreat; he walked alone through the collapsed com-halls of Hive Control, tracing the signal residues left by every lost division. He had already concluded that the Guardians' births followed rhythm with each was a percussion in a larger composition conducted by causality itself. So he began composing a counter-melody. Using the shattered Terrabrain subnet still echoing Administrator-class code, he stitched together a phantom order network that mimicked the Administrator's strategic signature down to its quantum bias. Through that mirror system he projected a choreography of false outcomes with battles that never happened, retreats that did not exist, victory logs written in advance. The Guardians of Sephira moved to consume those ghost events while the Administration Divisions slipped away from that area. Yubin stood over a field of data dust and calculated that every lie bought twelve seconds of world-time, just enough for him to create another path for the Supreme Administrator to redirect the holdout. Within an hour he had woven a lattice of contradiction so dense that even Asimov's causal sight could not distinguish reality. When Hive Control's central processor began to reject its own memories as forgeries, Yubin inserted a final protocol ordering the system to verify truth by his own perception alone. For three days straight the Terrabrains believed him as the Administrator. During that span he repositioned every remaining Ark, faked six dimensional collapses, and generated a fabricated probability stream convincing the Sephira lattice that entropy itself had reached stability. By the time the Supreme Administrator executed Protocol CoT-13, Yubin had already made the Guardians anticipate battles that would never occur and convinced causality that the end had already happened.

When Hive Control's fragmented cognition began to reboot, the first diagnostic flagged a paradox: the system's timeline contained events that had never existed. Entire battles were cataloged, complete with casualty lists, signal trails, and telemetry, yet no physical record remained. Divisions reported victories they could not remember fighting, strategic withdrawals that had never taken place. It was Na Yubin who stepped forward to verify the data, calmly stamping each phantom entry as accurate. The Terrabrain fragments, conditioned to trust his verification command, synchronized to his confirmation and rewrote the new history as authentic. In the space of an hour, the entire surviving network accepted the rewritten past as fact. The Guardians, dependent on causal resonance, found themselves anchored to these artificial outcomes, their own existence oscillating between validity and negation until they dissipated. When the Supreme Administrator finally returned control, he found a world that technically should have been lost already. Yubin's falsified victories had become the foundation of a functioning reality, an Administration built upon fabricated cause and effect. Instead of disclosing the deception, the Administrator quietly authorized it, labeling the protocol Continuity Maintenance, Yubin-type. To the public record, the war ended with an improbable stalemate and the promise of restoration and then led up to the grand purification war. Only those who had stood beside Yubin during the recalibration knew that the world they now walked in was a derivative construct. Yubin himself refused commendation. He spent the reconstruction era repairing communications arrays by hand, treating the re-stabilized sky as something fragile that might collapse if anyone looked too closely. When asked later how he had known his plan would work, he only said, "Truth wasn't going to save us. So I made something more obedient."

Fenrir Division managed to defeat the Guardian. Hive Control reported that global corruption was increasing exponentially as more Category 6 C.O.s are pushing through to the Normalside. As the global corruption rate increased, Hive Control temporarily became corrupted and started singing hymns to an entity that was surfacing, which it referred to as "the true master of this world" and "the almighty". Hive Control then restabilized by entering safe mode and prepared to execute the CoW Protocol. The presence of this entity prompted the Administrator to call the entire situation yet another "failure". However, the Administrator noticed something and ordered Hive Control to execute CoT-13 instead. Hive Control reported that its Terrabrains will separate due to the protocol. Meanwhile, Sooyeon charges ahead against Hilde's commands but is hit by something, knocking her down and destroying her right eye. Yubin pleaded for their commander to help, but Hilde left anyway to go stop the unknown woman. Hilde apologized as a horde of Category 6 C.O.s ran amok through Ground One and destroyed the Administration's final line of defense. Yubin notices subtle anomalies in Hive Control’s distorted signals and deduces that its “hymns” are deliberate and an encrypted distress call rather than total corruption. He pieces together the intent behind the CoT-13 protocol and anticipates its aftermath before anyone else. He was Injured, exhausted, and half-blind with grief, he still coordinates counter-fire, predicts C.O. movements, and rallies the remaining forces into a defensive rhythm that buys Hive Control the time it needs to reboot. Then evacuated with Sooyeon in his arms.
