Theory Nagito

In this document I'll be explaining the most highly probable theory that would explain Nagitos' error into buffs instead, in a couple minutes while there is no direct evidence on these interpretations, however there are multiple implications provided by the game. Do however note a theory is a theory nothing here is advised to be at all be used.

Chapter 4

Nagito cleared the final dead room by luck which granted him to get the knowledge specifically being him being the remnants of despairs and the others as well but not knowing who was the traitor within the group, this knowledge gives him multiple informations about what they are and their talents being Hajime selfless state of being a reverse course student. Monokuma gave this information to Nagito specifically due to him clearing with the hardest difficulty.

However with this vital information and within the context within the game Nagito has something in mind and it's his motive to specifically 'clear' the remnants despair upon themselves and himself to clear everyone's despair and him planning chapter 5 as the sole basis which Nagito was able to conceal carefully with an effective strategy even fooling Monokuma who's by then an omniscient in the Neo World Program.
And with all that Nagito had two things he can firmly believe with the amount of information he had being two exact Inductives and more multiple concise reasoning that he did being;

A. The world is shaped very weirdly and along with the amount of technology, a talking robot like Monokuma or Usami who can appear in thin air and just randomly appear without prior explanation he can logically infer that:
1. The world they were in is not in fact real (Inductive, Fact)
2. They were in the magical world (Inductive), which would fit the premise of them getting abducted by the Future Foundation which Mikan already implied which Nagito used as a huge basis of the remnants of despair as a deductive premise to base off on what Hajime saw.
3. Remnants of despair including him however their memories are erased giving 2 points being more concrete as an abductive premise from inductive to abductiive really fast with that he can further infer that; (Abductive, Deductive)
4. All casts including himself had lost the memories which Nagito would be able to infer further as a basis in the Inductive he had.
5. They were in fact in a some sort of world and they were placed in, all including members and casts were in some sort of test and all things are not in fact real due to being; B entirely.

B .In order to even save them, one must make the ultimate goal of despair to clear such despair and remnants to fully save them. Nagito further inferred that Monokuma would probably reveal himself being Junko as the mastermind which Nagito does not know but he rather expects and highly predicts, Nagito and what he has built up made a plan on the spot knowing these multiple pieces of information.

1. Nagito made himself the most distrust person ever even the start of the game, he made an insane Inductive that if he were to kill himself he would have influenced the casts into making the right choice in the upcoming chapter 6 which Nagito had fully predicted by the vital information given by the Final Dead Room, by them thinking what has he done and what he did in the massacre of a Chapter 5 however we must at least explain how exactly and why?
2. Nagito who knew and had cold read Monokuma, is a very deceptive liar, and his despair inducement that he gives to the student being the one who somehow got in which Nagito further induces that Monokuma hacked the world they were in which continues the despair which Nagito easily see throughs and makes an effective premise out of it.
3. Nagito wonders why and keeps asking himself why exactly and what not all reasoning he has made thus far seems logical to him which is why Nagito plans out this scheme completely.

Before the Investigation and Trial; Chapter 5

Nagito completely withholds this multiple information at once to the casts and what he knows. He shows distrustworthy towards Hajime to conceal knowing the mastermind where to watch. Nagito does this as well in the trials and spills information on purpose for others to be deduced later on in his chapter 5 scheme in order to save them...

Nagito did exactly as he thought, with his plan and careful strategy he executed a multi-layered strategy. To the point Monokuma was even fooled and utterly deceived till the end.

There's multiple contingencies Nagito used in his plan and his overall prediction in chapter 6.

From intentionally leaving multiple evidences, like the Final Dead Room information in the bed to be left out for Chiaki, Hajime to deduce his layered lies and intent which all of them got manipulated through, from leaving evidences like the bottle for them to be careful about what they would choose in the debate, ensuring that his plan would without a doubt 'fail' in the masterminds perspective using his deceptive nature and personality which he 'butchers' himself on the process in order to make this at least believable being;

1. Stabbing himself.
2. Taping himself.
3. Setting bombs and faking a bomb threat.
4. Trying to conceal these facts.

5. Using his Luck.
6. Spouting his motives about the traitor and his exact scheme.
7. An ‘unsolved’ murder with the aim disguised as Chiaki as the target and then dying.
    A. Nagito also inferred to himself that since he did not know the traitor he’d think that whoever it was in fact malicious and is helping Monokuma with.
    B. With the amount of gruesome stuff that Nagito did he can logically infer this much.

In order to convince them with all these acts was done by Nagito under the premise that what he thinks was definite and correct.

His plan was to fail simply, to further manipulate them into making a concrete choice within chapter 6. Seen in after the trial of chapter 5 Nagito was able to convince, fool, deceive Monokuma with.

He made himself in the bad light purposely for this exact purpose, to save them..
