A recently released document on Izuru Kamukura was found to be poorly structured, containing inconsistencies, misinformation, and fallacies. Prior to its official release, I had access to this document and had already identified its shortcomings, particularly in its scaling and portrayal of Izuru's feats. This corrective document will exclusively address the inaccuracies present in the original document, with a focus on Izuru's feats in the Working Memory Index (WMI).

Izuru Kamukura Compilation (SPOLERS AND GORE WARNING)
The video above was linked to a feat where Izuru supposedly recovered all of his memories in an instant. The timestamp provided was between the period 4:40 - 4:51 and was captioned with the statement, “Izuru had to remember his talents that had consists with these particular talents not only that his past memories altogether, remember Izuru is an old man but I’m not yet to determine his age if I’m going to estimate it around 80 or 90 at least.”

Firstly nowhere in the danganronpa canon is it stated that Izuru possesses the memories of the original founder, nor does it ever state that he possesses any semblance of that identity. In fact, Izuru was only named after the original founder and had no memories of that past life. It is also stated multiple times by Izuru himself that he is unaware of Hajime’s memories. Ironically in the time stamp provided Izuru states that he is unaware of who the body originally belonged to and his past identity.

Between the timestamps 4:38 - 4:51:
Chiaki: “You’re still in there aren’t you?”

Izuru: “Was that my name? Is that whose body this used to be? All vestiges of the former identity have been erased to make way for me.”

Between the timestamps 0:08 - 0:18
Scientist: “You have been born anew. A phoenix from the ashes. I hereby christen you Izuru Kamukura in honor of our school’s glorious founder.”

The original document fails to provide any scans or video evidence directly proving that Izuru inherited the memories of the school's founder. Moreover, it assumes that Izuru processed this information immediately after his "rebirth," despite no such statements existing in the anime. The anime explicitly states that Izuru was simply named after the founder, rather than being the founder himself.

The document presents the idea that “The process, Izuru had to process and calculate the information stored onto his mindset and brain, past experience, past memories, past abilities. Izuru accurately knew this and he fully adapted to Hajime's body quite easily. The moment Izuru woke up, he recovered the memories that fast.”

The memory statement was disproven above which leaves the points that he had processed through his abilities and adapted to Hajime’s body.

While it's true that Izuru possesses all talents from all students, the document's assumption that he learned all these abilities in a singular moment lacks evidence. Additionally, the document's assertion that Izuru accurately knew this and fully adapted to Hajime's body quite easily can be explained without resorting to PSI, as the document suggests.

Izuru's own explanation about his memory loss emphasizes the fact that his memories had been erased prior to his rebirth. This is an important notion to understand before continuing into why the feat described in the document is invalid. At first analysis, it might seem reasonable to assume that he instantly acquired all knowledge and abilities at the moment of his "rebirth." However, this explanation is both unrealistic and contradicted by the nature of the program that created Izuru.

The Hope Cultivation Plan, the program responsible for Izuru's creation, involved altering Hajime's brain to transform him into Izuru experimented on Hajime’s brain during the process of creating Izuru. Therefore, it's logical to infer that when Izuru woke up, he already possessed all the talents encoded in his mind. Which raises the question: how is this explanation different from the reasoning provided in the original document? Additionally, it may lead to new questions, such as how Izuru already had these talents if his memory was just wiped, and whether this still requires processing information. These questions will be addressed in the following explanation.

Izuru's situation at birth shares similarities with individuals affected by mental disorders like dementia and Alzheimer's. These conditions significantly impair cognitive function, often resulting in profound memory loss extending over several years. Despite the prominent memory deficits, motor skills tend to remain relatively intact. Individuals may retain learned skills, even without conscious recollection of the learning process. This suggests that Izuru may not have needed to acquire all his skills immediately upon awakening but could have already possessed them, similar to the retention of procedural memories in individuals with cognitive impairments.

This explanation offers a more plausible alternative to the assumptions made in the document, as it doesn't rely on unverifiable assumptions. Additionally, it aligns with the known facts that Hajime's brain underwent experimentation and rigorous conditioning and training before his transformation into Izuru.

The final point I shall discuss in this document is the statements made regarding the point regarding Izuru’s PSI against Junko. While I don’t have many disagreements with the idea regarding Izuru dodging Junko’s bat, the explanation provided in the document is very misleading and lacks evidence to support its conclusions.

Firstly it lacks any evidence to show how they arrived at the number “Speed of visualizing? 0.000000003 milliseconds speed without once glancing nor looking, 147 Frames speed.” The document assumes that it is required for Izuru to visualize Junko's full body while avoiding her bat. When avoiding an object an individual does not need to visualize the object, they simply need to have fast enough PSI to react to the object and avoid it.