a. Akiyama's Core Trait: Seeing Through the Game: Akiyama's defining characteristic in Liar Game is his ability to immediately see through elaborate traps and understand the "game" being played, often before others even grasp the rules. The first thing he looks for is the hidden intent behind the setup, not just the surface-level facts.

    - Bullshit as proven in the story of Liar Game itself he does need multiple practice rounds to figure something out. Nothing more than wank by OP

b. "Not a Traditional Murder": The Akiyama solution does state "This is not a traditional murder" and "Nagito orchestrated this himself" as immediate deductions. This isn't about being faster than Hajime; it's about Akiyama's specific psychological lens. The multiple stabbings (non-fatal), the fire (distraction), and the death by poison (hidden cause) are all hallmarks of an overly elaborate, self-sacrificing scheme that a mind like Akiyama's would immediately flag as suspicious orchestration rather than a simple act of violence.
    - Also bullshit as again while he would understand the character there is nothing proving he'd actually put together 2 and 2 this fast. Actually if anything there is proof to the opposite in the Contraband game vs Yokoya

c. Shock vs. Analysis: While shock is human, Akiyama's professional persona often kicks in to override it. He doesn't get paralyzed by emotion; he channels it into immediate analysis of the "game." His unique talent is precisely seeing the "game" and its hidden rules in situations designed to mislead. Nagito's murder is literally a deadly game.
    - Never seen him react to ANYTHING close to this before. So no this is just conjecture unless you can show me a point in LG were he just "And so"s a fucking torture scene(something the series diliberatly places to the opposite) this point is unprovable therefore invalid. Try again shortstack

- Fan's Argument: Nagito's "hax" luck would ensure no fingerprints or evidence, and Akiyama wouldn't have the tools or know-how to use them properly without destroying proof.
- Debunking/Counter-Argument:

a. Luck's Specificity: Nagito's luck is indeed a major factor. However, his luck often manipulates outcomes and events, not necessarily the physical properties of matter to perfectly erase all forensic traces. His luck ensured the right person threw the grenade, not that the grenade became forensically sterile. For Akiyama, the "impossibility" would be the first clue that there's a trick, leading him to look for unseen evidence.
    - Welcome to another faliable counter argument presented by the Liar game community: This time its presented on NOT KNOWING HOW NAGITO'S LUCK WORKS. Nagito's luck outright killed world ender and erased any evidence of his existence there, this is also true for multiple instances in DR 3 and Goodbye despair where his luck deliberately is shown to erase nature of how objects work. Yes this will effect fingerprints.
    - Secondly you cant find evidence that doesnt exist, if there is no fingerprints or anything Chiaki ratting herself out is his only option. He is not shown to have soul read anyone before and there is no evidence he'd be able to figure something like this out

b. "No Evidence Aki Legitimately Knows How to Use These Tools": This is a valid point concerning the Danganronpa setting. The critique rightly points out that the students (and by extension, anyone operating within the game's mechanics) do not possess real-world forensic tools.
    - This is an outright admission he couldnt actually figure it out

-
    a. Timing: The Akiyama solution's "Step 4: Forensic Fingerprint Reconstruction" implies actions before the trial starts, during the investigation phase. The prompt for Akiyama would assume he's brought in during the initial investigation period, akin to how the students investigate before the class trial.
        - He wouldnt have the basis to go over Nagito''s body again with presented knowledge he doesnt have lmao therefore he cant do this pretrail

    b. Investigation Phase: In Danganronpa, the students do investigate the crime scene thoroughly before the trial begins. They collect Monokuma files, examine bodies, search rooms, and gather evidence. Akiyama's detailed analysis would occur during this initial investigation phase, not after the trial has officially begun and locked everyone in. So, he would have access to the crime scene.
        - Monokuma does stop this investigation and rigs it to where both sides would seemingly have an equal chance at victory(its why the Monokuma files gave everyone everything damn near here). Akiyama has shown not one peice of evidence proving that he could actually forensically investigate a body properly and Mikan isnt there to bail they ass out

- Fan's Argument: Monokuma would just laugh at Akiyama's ethical challenge. Akiyama is being "wanked."
- Debunking/Counter-Argument:
    a. Monokuma's Goal vs. Akiyama's Philosophy: While Monokuma would absolutely laugh and revel in the despair, Akiyama's statement isn't meant to sway Monokuma. It's meant to frame the truth for the other participants and for himself. Akiyama is driven by a desire to expose manipulation and highlight the moral ambiguities of rigged games, even when the rules are absolute. His philosophical conclusion is for the benefit of the human players, not the sadistic mascot.

- Wouldnt matter Chiaki does this shit better her damn self 1 and 2 Aki wouldnt have the means to figure out it was Chiaki even by your own admission

b. The "Wank" Argument: This is subjective. The entire premise of the prompt was "How Akiyama Shinichi Would Solve Danganronpa V2 Chapter 5," which inherently invites applying his character's strengths to the problem. To solve such a complex, seemingly impossible case as Akiyama requires pushing the boundaries of what's conventionally possible for the in-game characters. The previous solution was a thought experiment on applying Akiyama's unique problem-solving to a Danganronpa case, not a claim that it's how the Danganronpa universe explicitly operates for the actual characters. Overall Conclusion on the Fan's Criticism: The fan's criticism has valid points, particularly regarding the limitations of forensic tools within the Danganronpa game's setting. The detailed chemical analysis proposed for Akiyama would indeed be difficult to perform with the resources available to the students.
   - You assume Aki is an all knowing god for this analysis, often overhyping or outright ignoring shown limitations for Aki. This leads to you assuming shit that he himself hasnt shown an affinity close to
     - This also includes assuming he could figure out something HE DOESNT HAVE THE INFORMATION TO FIGURE OUT which is a fallacy.

c. His unparalleled deductive reasoning.
   - Wank he has good reasoning in the verse but this doesnt actually have the feats to back up being more than a mid tier in DR who have almost hax like deduction feats

d. His focus on human psychology and hidden intent.
   - He generally needs multiple example rounds of games or someone completely fodder to read, with Nagito's entire persona shift towards the end of the previous chapter he wouldnt be able to figure ts the fuck out.

e. His ability to find the single, crucial logical flaw in an otherwise perfect scheme. While Akiyama might not perform the exact chemical tests described, his method for identifying the key information (like the poisoned grenade and the random selection mechanism) would still be driven by his logical process. He would rely on the logic of the setup and the known actions of the participants to pinpoint the killer, similar to how Hajime ultimately does, but perhaps with a faster, more direct path to understanding Nagito's full intent. The core of the "Akiyama solution" isn't about specific tools, but about applying his specific intellectual lens to a "game" that is designed to be unsolvable by conventional means. The "impossibility" is exactly what he thrives on.

- Another wank ass statement he generally needs multiple examples on how something works ALONG with someone else actively screwing up to help him figure this shit the fuck out. This also doesnt explain how he would ever find out the killer. He would get to the killer being the traitor aight but he'd never figure out who the traitor is because its impossible for a realistic person to figure out something when there is no proof for it. This would still need Chiaki coming up which is a failure condition
- To add to this there isnt a thing he has done that was at all impossible, his best feats are just taking advantage of Yokoya being a fuck up. This far and away is outside of his expertise therefore we can not assume he can do any more than Hajime did

No you are over hyping Aki and giving him shit he both has never shown to be capable of and there is no evidence of him even being in a similar situation

You are also outright giving him evidence that outright doesnt exist for whatever reason to push a narrative

Conclusion: You are nothing more than a Dulluisional Liar Game fan like all the rest, using AI to type a response you cant come up with, Aki cant do this nor can any other character that is realistic because of Nagito's luck hax outright removing ANY SIGN that the traitor is Chiaki. Chiaki even removed everything lmao all of this comes off as conclusion bias imo